ADVICE FROM YOUR PEERS

In order to solidify a job after graduate school, I began to apply about 3 months before graduation. I reached out to Principals at all schools of interest, expressing my interest via email, attaching my resume to that email, and arranging an informational interview/shadowing prior to applying. This allowed me to truly understand the environment of my schools of interest and allowed me to form relationships prior to making a commitment to working at a specific school.

I started at individual company websites, and applied to jobs that interested me. I also utilized the email lists from Penn, and applied to jobs there. I broadened my search to include more general websites that had a broader range of positions. I would recommend more networking for current students - if you know someone who knows someone who works in a company that you'd like to work for, start there.

I relied heavily on Idealist.org and also set up a few informational interviews with agencies that I was interested in. I also made sure my past employers and mentors knew I was in the job search and they helped me find openings as well.

I began doing research about the types of positions I wanted when I started my degree, and then structured my school projects and internships around the kind of work I wanted to be qualified for. I highly recommend students begin their cursory search when they start their graduate/professional studies, in order to know how to best prepare themselves throughout their time in school for the job they want. My current position is only a necessary step in the direction of the type of job/career I want, because it provides experience that practicum and internship could not. It is important to know what steps lay between the end of a graduate program and the beginning of a career you want.

Begin your job search first semester. With the one year master's program, it is easy to put it off because first semester can be overwhelming trying to get adjusted to a new city, new program, new people, and the academic workload. But it is important to utilize all the services Penn offers.

My job search strategy was to utilize every resource I had available. Patience is also very important. Three of the four interviews I received were from job searching sites and the fourth, the job that I was offered, I heard about from the friend of my sister. Finding a job is a very long and stressful process but if you have patience and you are willing to jump on every opportunity that is available, you will eventually find something. Don't limit yourself to one department or one location. Give your resume to everyone and anyone, you never know who may know someone who knows of an opening.

Try to be open-minded in your search. Often, job descriptions are not comprehensive and jobs that you may feel you are over-qualified for could in actuality be a potential good match. Apply anyway and take a chance that you get some sort of interview to learn more about the position. Also, don't get caught up in job titles, especially for those pursuing careers within education administration. Titles do not necessarily represent what your true role might be within an institution.

All of my job leads came through faculty contacts, which I built during my time at GSE and through volunteer work. I would highly recommend volunteering for a faculty member or at least seeking their support in the job search.

Look outside of Philadelphia. Penn grads tend to want to stay near Penn, so the local market gets really glutted with applicants. Don't be afraid to ask friends who work in your field to be on the lookout for openings. And be open-minded! If you had told me two years ago that I would be teaching 6th grade at a small private school and that I would absolutely love it, I would have laughed at you. But I was so desperate for work that I took a chance, and I can't imagine a better job.

I believe that networking with existing friends and professional contacts is the best way to obtain a job. My strategy whenever seeking a new job has been to build a list of the people I know who I believe to be connected in the area where I'm looking for employment. During weekdays, I contact one person from that list each day. The purpose of my call (although usually emails may have to suffice) is to update the person with my current status as well as let them know that I am interested in my next career opportunity and if they hear of anything, please contact me or refer my name to the caller. Over the course of three or four weeks, the list expands as I talk with people and they, in turn, refer me to other people. In 20 years plus of practicing this approach, I have never run out of contacts for my list before I have secured an interview or two for my next job opportunity. Planning for the switch over time is more effective and less stressful than waiting until after you've graduated or you're unemployed.

For those applying to Ph.D. programs, keep the December 1st deadline in mind. Start early, secure advisers for assistance (e.g. to read statement draft after draft), budget for all components of applying and interviewing, get support from your friends and colleagues (don't do it alone), role-play interviews, and foremost take care of yourself.

My strategy has been to target geographic areas I wish to work in an attempt to find jobs within my field of study. Get started as early as possible. I waited until I graduated to take my exams and even though I passed everything in late July, it was late August before I got my scores. I have waited 2.5 months and counting for my certificate to be processed by Pennsylvania Dept of Education which has cost me three interviews. Start as early as you can!
